For the past six years the government has asked us to deliver social value in public sector projects – but has this happened? And do we really understand what social value is? Due to imminent changes in legislation, now is the time to take social value seriously.

In 2012, the Public Services (Social Value) Act came into force requiring the public sector to secure social value investment within contracts. At the time, it was a big move which underlined the government's commitment to prioritising social, economic and environmental benefits rather than lowest tender costs during the procurement process.

Peter Masonbrook explains what the objectives are behind the act are and how to ensure public sector clients can optimise the benefit of measuring the success of both CSR and social value. He will explain how new opportunities from both local and national commissions will help to improve health and reduce inequalities.
